Collins defines outsider-within as "a person who simultaneously inhabits two worlds: the world of the dominant culture and the world of the marginalized group." She argues that this dual position can provide marginalized people with a unique perspective on the world, enabling them to see both the limitations of the dominant culture and the strengths of their own communities.

Collins's concept of outsider-within has been used to explain a wide range of phenomena, from the experiences of Black women in academia to the activism of queer people of color. It has also been used to develop new strategies for social change, such as collaborative research and community-based organizing.

In her book Fighting Words: Black Women and the Search for Justice, Collins argues that intellectual activism is essential for social change. She writes, "Intellectual activism is a form of resistance that uses the power of knowledge to challenge oppression and create a more just world." Collins believes that Black women have a unique role to play in intellectual activism, as they are often able to see the world from a unique perspective and develop innovative solutions to social problems.

Collins's work on intellectual activism has been widely praised by scholars and activists alike. She has received numerous awards for her work, including the prestigious MacArthur Foundation "genius" grant. Her work has also been translated into many languages and has been taught in universities around the world.
