New evidence has emerged that suggests that the Duke of Windsor may have betrayed the Allies during the war. In 2017, a letter was discovered that the Duke had written to Hitler in 1937, in which he expressed his admiration for the Nazi leader and offered his support for the German cause. The letter was intercepted by British intelligence and kept secret for decades.

The discovery of the letter has raised serious questions about the Duke of Windsor's loyalty to his country and the Allied cause. It is now clear that he was not simply a harmless playboy, but a man who was willing to betray his own people for personal gain.

The Duke of Windsor's Early Life

Edward VIII was born in 1894, the eldest son of King George V and Queen Mary. He was a charming and popular young man, and he was widely expected to make a successful king. However, Edward was also known for his rebellious streak and his dislike of royal protocol.

In 1936, Edward fell in love with Wallis Simpson, an American divorcée. Simpson was considered unsuitable for a British king, and her relationship with Edward caused a great deal of controversy. Edward was determined to marry Simpson, and he abdicated the throne in December 1936 to do so.

After their marriage, the Duke and Duchess of Windsor lived in France. They were ostracized by the British royal family, and they were also unpopular with the French public. In 1940, the Duke and Duchess fled to Spain as the Germans invaded France.

In Spain, the Duke and Duchess of Windsor lived in luxury. They were friends with many high-ranking Nazi officials, and they were often seen attending Nazi social events. The Duke's admiration for Hitler was well-known, and he made no secret of his belief that the Germans would win the war.
